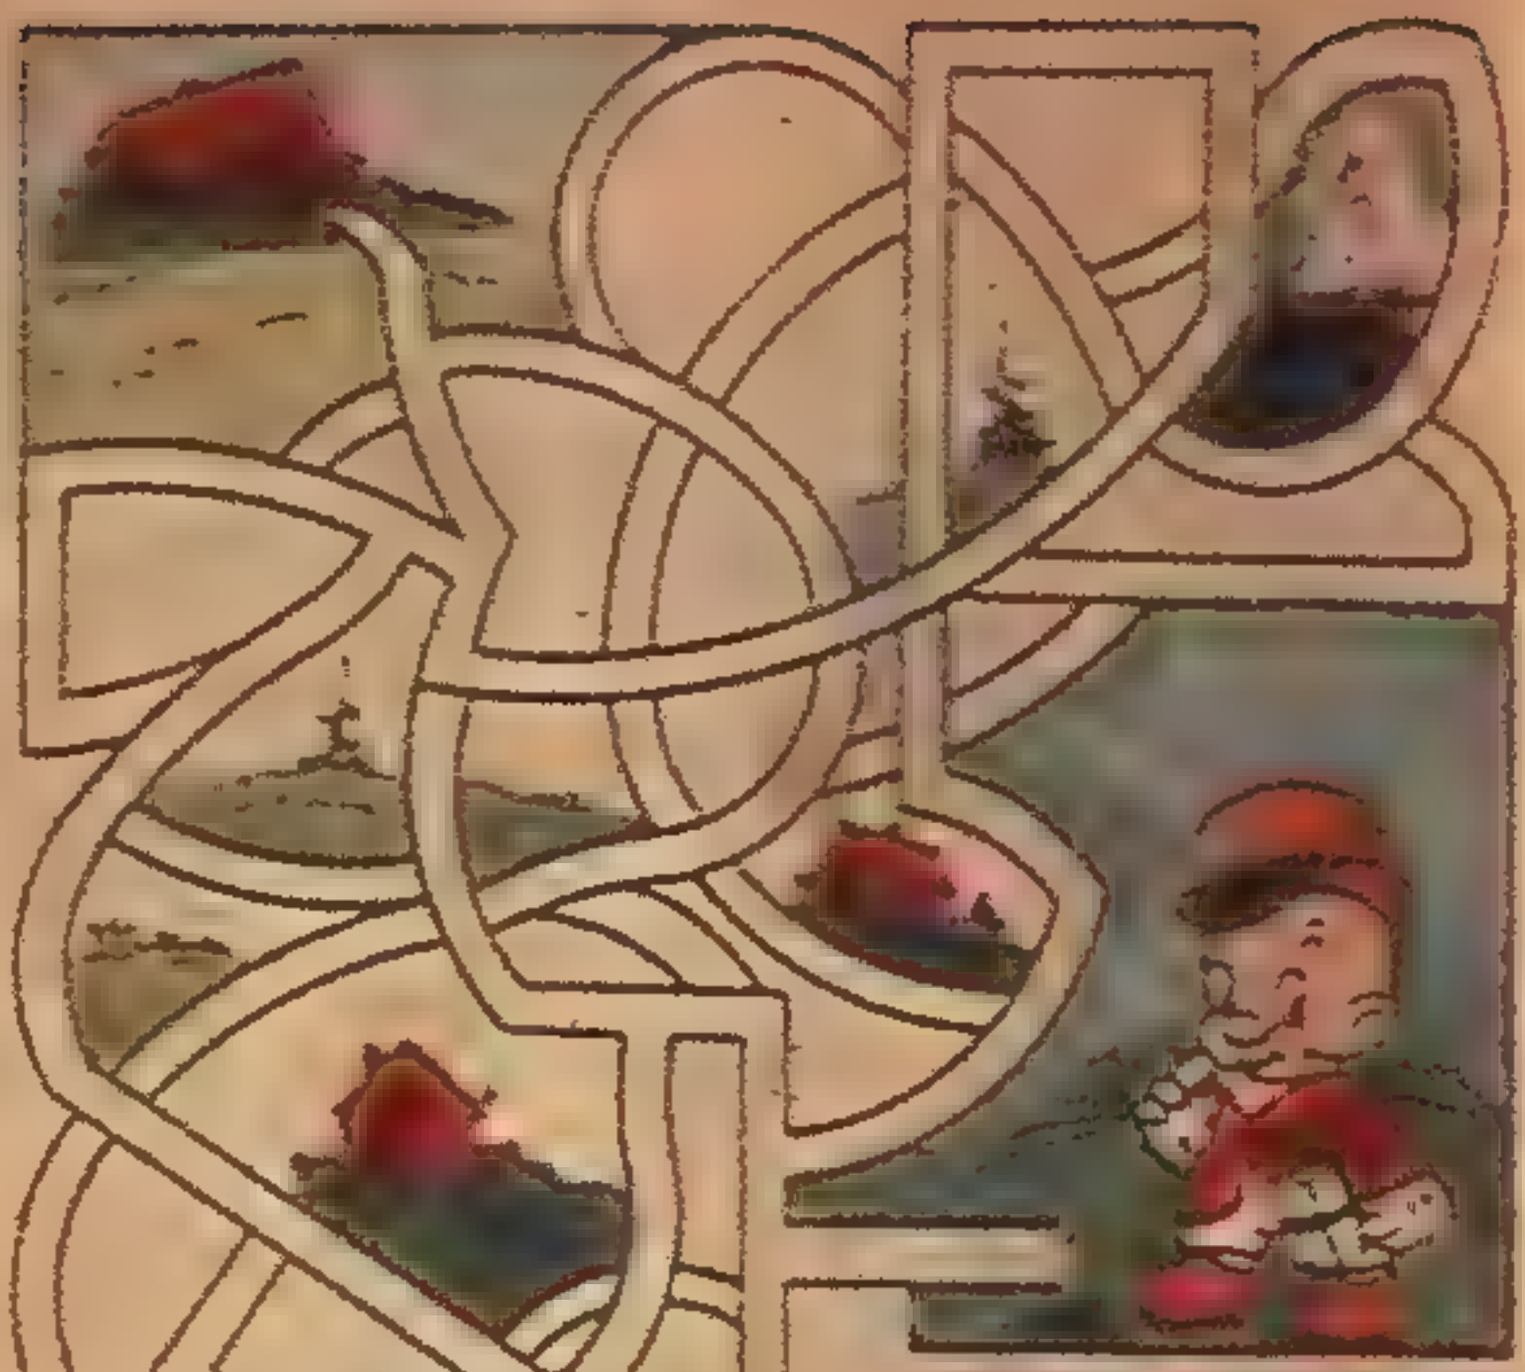
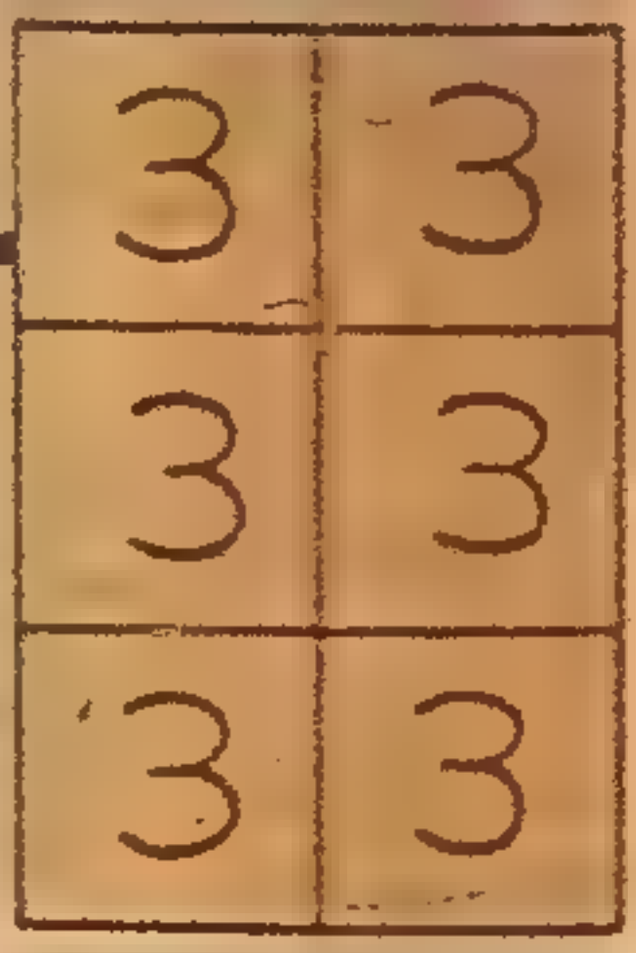
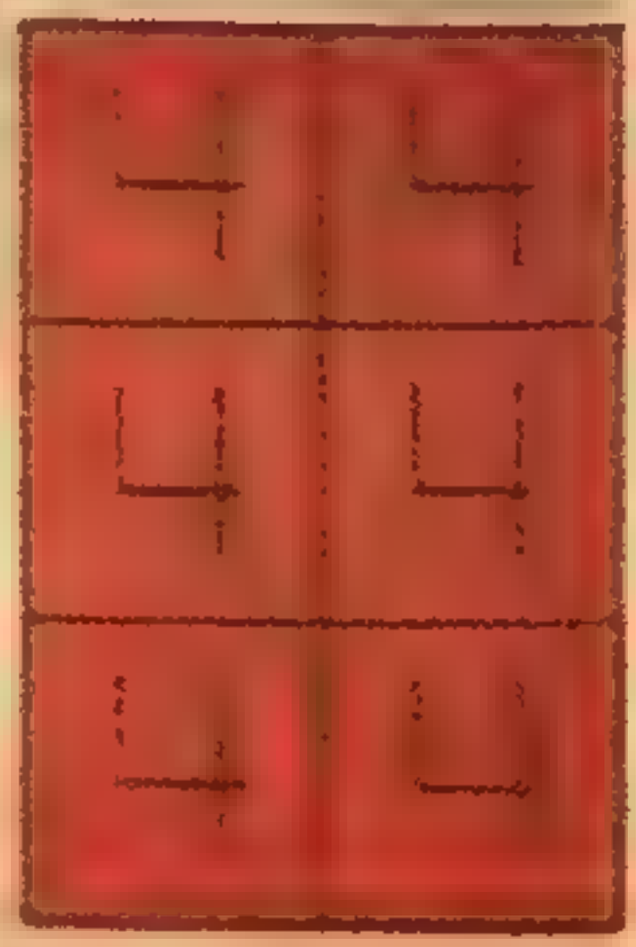
WHICH WAY TO PORKY'S PARTY?

When Elmer went to Porky's party, he found all paths but one, blocked. Can you trace the path that he took, with only one try? How long will it take you to find the right path?

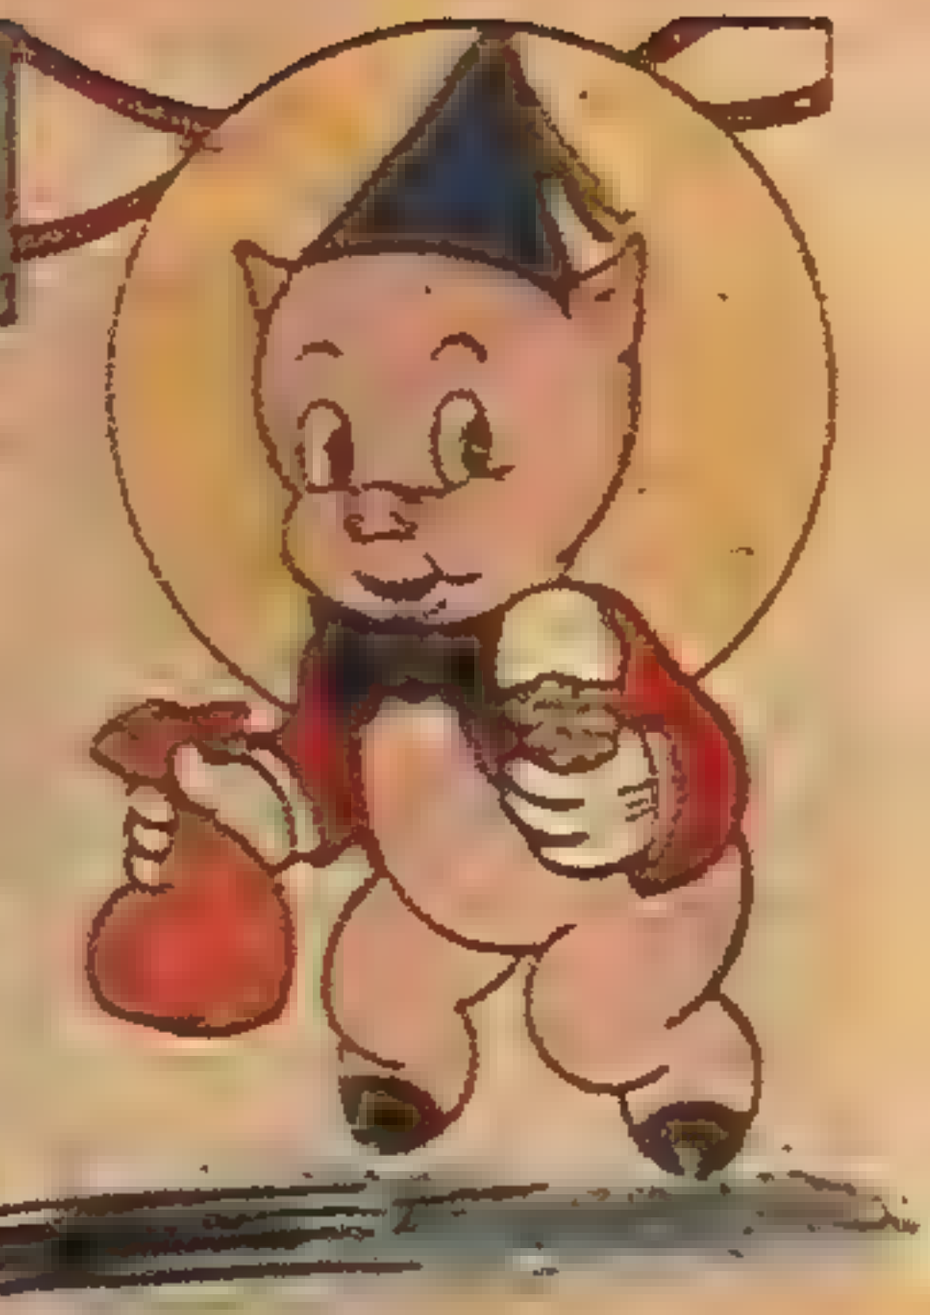




GRAB BAG GAME: By using the material on the bottom of these two pages, 4 or 2 persons may play this game. If only 2 play, each uses 2 of the number box sections, 1 and 2, or 3 and 4, placing them on the table. However, the tiny 24 pictures are carefully cut out, and put in a paper bag. Each player has his turn to draw one picture from the bag. If the number on the picture is the same as on his section, he places it there. If not, he puts it back in the bag. First player filling his set of 6 boxes, wins. If 8 persons want to play at the same time, they may have teams of 2. If so, each person has a separate chance. A 9th person may pass the paper bag around.



PORKY'S GAMES



GUESS THE PEANUTS GAME: For something to do at a party, Porky says this guessing game is fine. Put a number of peanuts, anywhere from 5 to 25 in a paper bag. Hold the bag the way Porky does, and ask each child, one at a time, to guess the exact amount. The first to guess the exact number of peanuts wins the bag. Each child should have the same number of guesses, and if one wins before all have had their chance, another bag with a different amount may be used for the rest of the children. However, if only one bag is to be used, the holder may not reveal who has guessed the right amount until all have had their turns. Then, if more than one has guessed the exact amount, the peanuts may be divided evenly, or the full amount given to each winner.

TALENT CONTEST: Besides games, Porky likes talent contests at a party. The guests all sit down like an audience. Then, one at a time, each child is given the chance to act, sing, dance, or even recite a little poem, or tell a story. The one who wins is the one who gets the most applause. A little prize may be given for the best performance, such as a doll book for a girl, or a coloring book or Porky comic book for either the girl or boy winner.

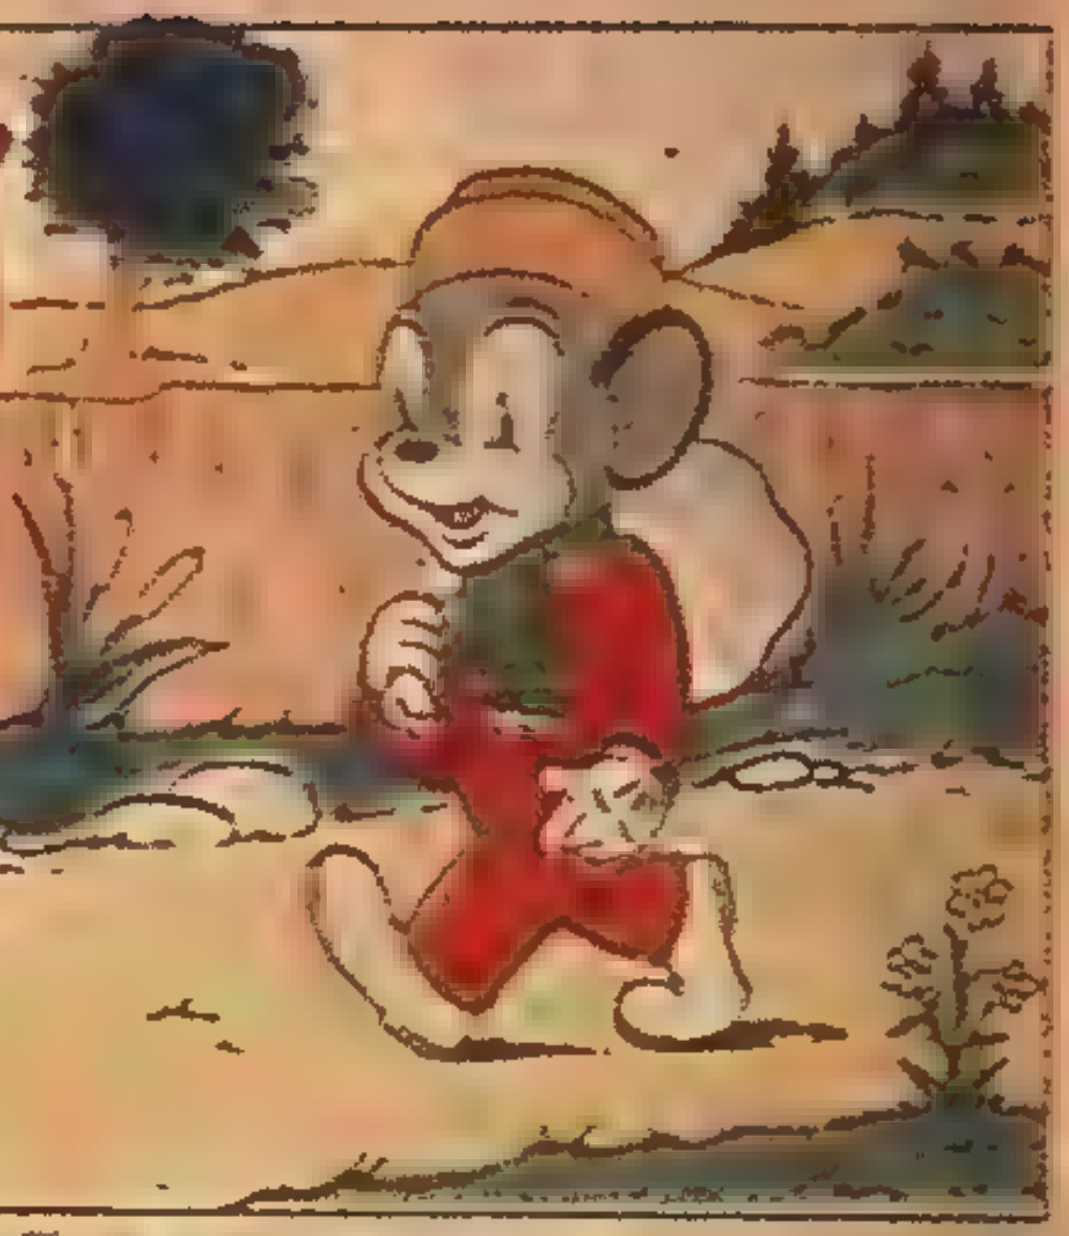
SNIFFLES RUNS AWAY



by Leon Schlesinger

Sniffles was late one summer morning, when the other members of the Secret Six Club gathered in Porky Pig's garage for their regular meeting.

"I wish he'd hurry, so we can decide about our picnic," Petunia said impatiently.

As she spoke, Sniffles appeared in the doorway. He was carrying a bulky bundle on his small shoulders and his eyes were shining excitedly.

"It's about time you're showin' up," Bugs Bunny told him. "We're cookin' up a picnic. Come on in."

"I'm not coming in," Sniffles answered in a firm voice. "I just stopped to say good-bye. I'm running away from home!"

"R-Runnin' a-away!" Porky gasped, while the others stared in open-mouthed surprise. "You c-can't d-do that. What'll your f-folks say?"

"They won't know about it till I'm gone," Sniffles replied. "I slipped outa the house and left a note."

"What's the big idea?" Bugs Bunny asked roughly.

"I'm tired of staying around home, doing the same old things," Sniffles explained. "I'm going out and see the world. I want to be my own boss and do what I please. Maybe I might even enlist in the Army or Navy or Marines or something."

"You're too young. They won't take you," Little Blabbermouse said firmly.

"Well, we'll see. Anyway I'm going." Sniffles' voice rang with excitement. "Maybe I'll come back to see you in ten or fifteen years. Maybe I'll just keep on traveling and seeing the world."

"You'll be back, all right, and in less'n ten or fifteen days," Bugs chuckled. "Runnin' away isn't all it's cracked up to be. I know. I ran away twice. And I came back."

"Maybe you did, Bugs, but I won't!" Sniffles shook his head firmly.

"Why don't you stay until after our picnic, Sniffles?" Petunia coaxed.

"Picnic!" Sniffles exclaimed in disgust. "What do I care about a silly old picnic! I'm going right now. I'll send you a postcard maybe from Africa or India or someplace. S'long." With a jaunty wave of his hand, Sniffles turned and disappeared.

"We ought to stop him," Petunia cried, starting for the door.

"Let him go," Bugs grinned, pulling her back. "He'll come home."

Sniffles walked quickly through the village and soon reached the open country. He avoided the main highways, fearing that his family or the Secret Stars might follow him. He walked across rough fields and along rutty side roads. At noon he sat down in the shade of a tree, opened his bundle, and pulled out a package of food. When he had eaten half the bread and cold meat, he put the remainder back in the bundle and trudged onward.

All afternoon he walked, stopping now and then to rest in the shade. The sun was hot and the bundle, slung across his small back, was heavy.

Finally the sun sank and it began to grow dark. Sniffles was tired and lonely, and his shoulders ached from the burden of the bundle. Tears came into his eyes, and he almost wished that he were safe at home.

"I'll find a place to sleep and I'll feel better in the morning," he told himself bravely, blinking back the tears. "Maybe tomorrow I'll find a big town where nobody'll know me. Then I can get a job or enlist or something."

So he plodded wearily onward through the dusk, looking for a place to sleep. Finally he saw a haystack in a nearby field. He stumbled across the stubbly ground to the haystack and burrowed a hole in its side. When he was snuggled in the hay, he ate the rest of his food. Then he fell asleep.

He was wakened by the touch of something cold and wet on his face. He opened his eyes to see a dark gray morning and pouring rain.

"I'll stay here, where it's dry, till the rain stops," he decided, burrowing deeper into the sheltering haystack.

It was a long, miserable day, and Sniffles grew hungrier and hungrier. Finally, late in the afternoon, he could stand his hunger no longer. He crawled from the haystack and hurried across the fields to a small farmhouse. He left his bundle in the haystack, planning to return there after he had found something to eat.

He knocked timidly on the back door of the farmhouse.

"Please, Ma'am, could I have a glass of milk and a piece of bread?" he stammered in a weak, small voice, when a pleasant-faced woman opened the door. "I'll be glad to work to pay for it."

The woman looked down at the dirty, little figure, with its tousled hair, mussed clothes, and smudged face.

"Come in, son," she said in a kindly voice. "What are you doing out in this rain?"

"I'm visiting at my aunt's house," Sniffles answered, thinking quickly. "I went out to play and I got lost. My aunt lives over that way somewhere." He waved his arm vaguely.

"I see," the woman said and led the way into a cheerful kitchen.

As she set food on the table, she turned on a small radio on a shelf.

A news program was on the air and the broadcaster's voice was saying, "The youngster's parents have offered a substantial reward for any news of the missing Sniffles. I will repeat his description. His hair is—"

Sniffles waited no longer. He knew that the woman would recognize him. He raced from the house and across the fields, running wildly until he was breathless and the farmhouse was far behind.

Darkness fell and the rain poured down in a steady torrent. At last Sniffles stumbled onto the smooth ribbon of a highway. With the darkness and the rain to shield him, he dared to venture forth on the road. He had lost all sense of direction, so he trudged forward, a hungry, weary, soaked, bedraggled little figure.

Finally he saw the lights of a town glimmering through the rain. He plodded toward the lights, looking neither to the right nor to the left in the darkness. He hoped that he could find food and shelter in that strange town.

When he reached the first straggling houses on the outskirts of the town, he stopped and looked around him in startled amazement.

It was not a strange town! It was his own home village! In his wild flight from the farmhouse, he had turned back toward home. Home! He could see his own house, his soft clean bed, the warm good food on the table. He sobbed with joy and relief and ran along the familiar streets toward home.

As he stepped up on the porch of his own house, the door opened and the five Secret Sixers appeared. With eager shouts they pulled him into the house.

"W-We've b-been w-waiting here f-for n-news of y-you," Porky stuttered.

"Well, did you see enough of the world?" Bugs asked, grinning.

"Yep," Sniffles answered slowly and sighed.

"Are you going to stay home now so you can go to the picnic tomorrow, Sniffles?" Petunia cried.

"You bet I am," Sniffles smiled, thinking of the feast which awaited him the next day. "I sure like picnics. I don't think I'll ever run away again."

WHEN KAY KYSER, THE FAMOUS BAND LEADER, LOST HIS FAVORITE DOG, HE DECIDED THAT HE WOULD NEVER OWN ANOTHER PET. BUT ONE DAY, AFTER HIS RADIO BROADCAST, AN ADMIRER GAVE HIM A LITTLE BLACK COCKER SPANIEL PUPPY, DRESSED IN A COMPLETE "PROFESSORS" COSTUME, EVEN TO A TINY "MORTAR BOARD" HAT. "PROFESSOR" KYSER NAMED THE PUPPY "INKY" AND NOW INKY IS HIS CONSTANT COMPANION.

A MUTT DOG RECENTLY LOST THE CHANCE TO BE THE PAMPERED PET OF A MOVIE STAR. SPENCER TRACY TRIED TO BUY ONE OF THE MONGREL PUPS, WHICH APPEARED IN HIS PICTURE "TORTILLA FLATS." BUT THE DOG'S OWNER WOULDN'T SELL HIM. "HE IS SO SMART AND KNOWS SO MANY TRICKS THAT I THINK I'LL KEEP HIM MYSELF," THE OWNER TOLD TRACY.

TYRONE POWER IS NOW AN AIR RAID WARDEN. HE PATROLS HIS "BEAT" LATE AT NIGHT AND ONE OF THE HOUSES IN HIS DISTRICT IS AN OLD LADIES' HOME. IMAGINE THE EXCITEMENT OF THE OLD LADIES, IF THEY KNEW THE FAMOUS TYRONE WAS GUARDING THEM IN THIS NIGHT.
